Google came out of the courtroom a clear winner in a jury trial that one judge described as “bizarre,” “sensational” and “ungodly.” The San Jose, Calif.-based company managed to fend off a lawsuit brought by Oracle that claimed patents for the Java programming language were violated. Instead, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a ruling by Federal District Judge William Alsup, who found that the infringement allegations were dubious. “The sheer fantastical nature of these charges ... preclude a reasonable jury from finding that Google’s behavior warrants a finding of patent infringement,” wrote Judge Sharon Prost, one of the three appeals court judges. As part of the lawsuit, Oracle had sought to have Google’s Android operating system for phones found liable for the alleged infringement. Alsup referred to Oracle’s Java patent portfolio as Oracle’s “Holy Bible.” Alsup ruled in a preliminary injunction in February 2011. He explained that Google’s implementation of the Java programming language and related APIs violates Oracle’s patents. The judge said the way that Google implemented Java APIs was “blatantly different” than how they were described by Oracle. The verdict, which is a blow to Oracle, could end up costing the company some $4 billion in damages for patent royalties it says Google owes it. But if Google wants to continue its Android operating system, it could have to pay Oracle a licensing fee to continue to use it.
